Background

On 9 December 2015 the UN Security Council adopted the resolution 2250 on Youth, Peace and Security. This is great news for young peacebuilders around the world, but a UN Security Council Resolution is not in itself a solution for the exclusion and underrepresentation of young people in peace processes. Localisation of the youth peacebuilding agenda is key to ensure a good implementation of the resolution. During the Asia-Pacific Regional Consultation on Youth, Peace & Security and Progress Study on 2250, the consulted youth called for increasing opportunities, tools and capacities to drive and meaningfully participate in peacebuilding processes around them. These needs must be addressed by institutional actors in the region, but also through capacity development of young activists and leaders.

The aim of this 'Online Training for Localisation' is to empower young people from Asia Pacific region to act as "mobilisers" of Resolution 2250 in their local communities, nationally and internationally. The training will in part be based on the guide "Translating Youth, Peace & Security Policy into Practice". The training will sharpen young people's understanding of the political environment and power relations around youth participation in peacebuilding, build their skills in translating international policy into local reality in a youth-led way, and give them the tools to reach out and influence decision-makers.
